Set on the Shetland islands, "A Stranger Came Ashore" was a book that combined everything I like in a story: island life and culture. In addition, the story revolves around the legend of the Great Selkie, and while this is a book written for young readers, I was enthralled from beginning to end by the atmosphere of mystery knitted around it.

'The Stranger On the Shore' is a really interesting part of Away, but as far as I know it was written by Michael Gow as part of his text, its not a play in its own right. For majority of the play you would have noticed that she's really distant/weird/slightly psychotic which is all a manifestation of her grief of losing her son.

What made the experience of listening to Stranger on the Shore the most enjoyable? Mostly the only thing I really liked about the book was the romance. There were a lot of aspects that really frustrated me. The romance helped to mellow me out after having little rants about various other things. But there was more frustration than anything.
