This is how I dug my DT's burrow... First, a ramp and chamber. Then, I lined the ramp and chamber with wood, and put some uprights so it wouldn't collapse. Added a lid. The bottom of the chamber is about 24" below ground level. Finally, some dirt, and a mister and shade cabin. He used this burrow for a summer.

Kym McDonough is in a race against the clock—the biological clock, that is, of the desert tortoise. With fall well under way, Nevada's state reptile population is inching closer to brumation, which is the cold-blooded version of hibernation, in which tortoises hunker down in burrows to get through the cold months, occasionally rousing from their slumber on warmer winter days.
