China, of course, has a complex relationship to intellectual property today. On one hand, the now canonical "Four Great Inventions" of gunpowder, the compass, printing, and paper-making point to the country's long tradition of invention. On the other hand, there are many who still view China as much better at copying the ideas of others, than coming up with their own ideas.

Invention East-West | Intellectual Ventures

Paper was invented in China in the centuries before Christ and carried by Buddhist monks throughout East and Central Asia (Tsien, 1985), where Muslim Arabs encountered it in the eighth century CE. Muslims carried paper and papermaking to the Mediterranean region, and European Christians there learned how to make it by the twelfth century.
