What to Do When Politics and Family Collide | Psychology Today

To put it differently: politics, like life, is complex. Love, to be sure, is a powerful force. You could say, "All this earth is love," and that would be true in a general if not in an exact sense. But, without wanting to be too grim and Manichaeian about things, who holds power also matters enormously, and you have to understand where it lies, who holds it, and how it can be redistributed more equally. After all power can be used to oppose love.

Those who argue over politics don't love their country more than others. They just love to argue more than others. Strife and quarreling are symptoms of weak faith (Proverbs 10:12; 2 Timothy 2:23-25; James 4:1) and are among the things the Lord "detests." We need to rise above the vitriol and learn to love our neighbors the way God ...
