I bought this clock to replace an older Oregon Scientific model DP200A projection clock which has steadily gone downhill with failing segments and erratic time acquisition. As the other reviews reflect, Oregon Scientific doesn't make heirloom clocks, and is definitely a quality control "challenged" company.

The projection feature shines the current atomic time, outdoor temperature and future weather forecast on your choice of surfaces. The integrated light sensor detects the current light levels, and automatically adjusts the projection beam and the display to the perfect level of brightness - making it easy to see the projection at even the brightest time of day.

It doesn't dim enough with its auto dimming feature. Also the focus / optics were a little off and can't fully focus the projected image. I have it focused as best as it will offer, but my older Oregon Scientific is much much clearer and dims enough to let me sleep. Also the atomic clock feature has a weird time zone setting.

The Oregon Scientific RM313PNA is Simple, easy, and functional! These cool little clocks automatically set to the U.S. Atomic Clock and never need adjusting for Daylight Saving Time. The RM313PNA's projection feature offers a unique way to read time in the dark by casting soft glowing red numbers on a wall, ceiling, or just about any surface.

Oregon Scientific RM313PNA Blue Atomic Clock

Unlike previous Oregon Scientific projection clocks, you cannot position the unit to the side on a bedside cabinet and rotate the image 90 degrees. It's also worth noting that unlike other projection clocks the time and outdoor temp are not projected simultaneously, but instead the projection display toggles between them every few seconds, which I found to be annoying.
