Winnicott's theory of A Good Enough Mother states that there is an instinctive need that must be met by the mother in order to ensure a healthy lifestyle. The theory focuses on the mother and her role responsibility to recognize and properly provide the infants needs throughout all their stages of life.

Bowlby and Winnicott's Study of Child Development

Winnicott recognised that "the ordinary devoted mother" was not perfect and would, t therefore, inevitably make mistakes in the care of her infant. What she would then do, h however, was to make repairs and readjustments in her interaction with the infant.

Key Concepts - The Squiggle Foundation

Winnicott was a paediatrician who later became a psychoanalyst and a child psychiatrist. He was able to integrate his knowledge of infants, his knowledge of the emotional life of babies and children, much of which was based on his work with war evacuees.

Winnicott and Parenting | IAHIP

Winnicott took the view that you cannot consider the development of the child without taking into account the external environment, in particular in the varying interactions with parent figures. He considered the detail of how the infant transitions from undifferentiated unity to independence and realization of the mother as a separate person.

Donald Winnicott - Changing minds

In line with other psychoanalysts, Winnicott states that, during the first year of life, the mother and child constitute a unit. You can't talk about the baby as an entity that is separate from their mother, he says. The two form an indivisible psychic unit. Winnicott says that the mother is the first "context" a human being has.

Donald Winnicott and His Theory about the False Self ...

Winnicott claimed that "the foundations of health are laid down by the ordinary mother in her ordinary loving care of her own baby", central to which was the mother's attentive holding of her child. Winnicott considered that the "mother's technique of holding, of bathing, of feeding, of everything she did for the baby, added up to the child's first idea of the mother", as well as fostering the ability to experience the body as the place wherein one securely lives.

Symington developed Winnicott's contrast between true and false self to cover the sources of personal action, contrasting an autonomous and a discordant source of action – the latter drawn from the internalisation of external influences and pressures. Thus for example parental dreams of self-glorification by way of their child's achievements can be internalised as an alien discordant source ...

True self and false self - Wikipedia

Winnicott describes the holding environment as a developmental stage in which the child and mother are one entity, as yet undifferentiated in the infant's consciousness. His writings on the subject emphasized empathy, imagination and love between the caregiver and infant.

Holding and Containing - Winnicott (1960)

What Winnicott says is that the newborn baby at the breast is bonded to the mother—If the mother is 'good enough' at nurturing—in a way that merges the baby and mother. The baby is not aware of any separation. Soon, however, by the 3rd to 4th month of life, the infant begins, just begins, to sense that the mother is separate.
